Politicians, who have failed us over the years, are abandoning old parties and ideologies, and farm incomes are stagnant or on a decline," says Jaskaranpreet. He also bemoans the fact that there aren't platforms to discuss these issues. Currently, farm unions are seeking a law that makes MSP essential for purchase of produce, while farmers are under pressure to move away from water-guzzling crops, especially paddy. Parties like the AAP, Congress, Akali Dal and the BJP do propose solutions, but Jaskaranpreet says farmers don't know whom to trust. ■ scenario." He seeks an "ambitious vision" from a party/ leader that makes India "primed to be the next superpower" and supports a caste census if it can help reduce inequality. He also finds PM Narendra Modi's Viksit Bharat a "catchy key word" and supports the idea behind it. Ranjan doesn't fully agree that there's no effective Opposition in the country, but he feels that they come across as "disorganised". Helping the Late Bloomers

For Kritarth, a resident of Vikaspuri in New Delhi, good governance is a key election issue, and as an entrepreneur himself, he counts transparency as an important requisite for that. Moreover, the country should give an opportunity to those who, late in life, want to give entrepreneurship a shot. Having launched India's first job portal for retirees, Kritarth should know better.

Along with Ramesh Vij, a senior citizen himself, he founded Hum Agetech in 2017, India's first one-stop community-powered venture that caters to all the daily engagement, information and companionship-related needs of retirees and 'seenagers'. It boasts of a database of five million of them in 30 cities of India.

Though agencies like the Department for Promotion of Industry and Internal Trade have put some processes in place, things are still moving at a slow pace. "Starting from small and medium enterprises to becoming a tech company, one of the key challenges is transparency."

Malhotra believes that the country's policies should aim at helping entrepreneurs chase their dreams. His vote will be for those he thinks can help facilitate that. ■ -M.G. Arun
