a hyperlocal player, where we compete with regional and unorganised players, who hold the largest market share," says Ramesh Kalyanaraman, executive director, Kalyan Jewellers. Kalyan is present in 23 states and Union territories. To scale rapidly, it introduced the FOCO (franchisee-owned, company-operated) model two years ago. "This model allows us to expand without capital constraints while retaining control over pricing, inventory, location, staff appointments, and more," Kalyanaraman explains. Of the 130 stores, 80 are expected to be financed through the franchise route in FY25.

Titan, a leading player with an 8.5 per cent market share, has been well-established since launching Tanishq in 1994. Titan's jewellery division is now growing at a CAGR of 15-20 per cent with a Rs 38,352-crore turnover (excluding Rs 3,940 crore bullion sale) and operates stores in various formats—company-owned, franchisee-operated (COFO) and franchise-owned, franchise-operated (FOFO) stores in addition to the company-owned stores.

Like Kalyan and Tanishq, most players start with their own stores, but they venture into various franchise models once their supply chains and best practices are established, reducing the high capital investment required for stores. For instance, Senco enters new states with company-owned stores and then expands its presence in nearby cities through franchise stores. With a focus on the northern and eastern regions, it operates 159 stores, comprising 93 company-owned and 66 franchise stores as of FY24.

Kerala-based Joyalukkas is an outlier here. It operates only through company-owned stores, investing Rs 80 crore on average to open each shop. The regional player is now aiming to become a pan-India brand with an investment of Rs 6,000 crore to open 75 stores. "While we have a presence in northern and western states
