helped Rahul gain some of his lost sheen. Twenty-nine per cent respondents believe that he is best suited to revive the Congress, his highest rating since January 2020. A distant second is Sachin Pilot, the 45-year-old leader engaged in an unsettled fight with Ashok Gehlot over the chief ministerial chair in Rajasthan. Among the top five leaders who have the potential to revive the Congress, he is the only one who is not from the Gandhi family or has not occupied the PM's chair or become the party president. Even among the non-Gandhi Congress leaders best-suited to revive the party, Pilot, with 23.7 per cent backing him, is a close second to former prime minister Manmohan Singh, who earns the support of 25 per cent respondents. That the first two choices for non-Gandhi leaders are a 90-year-old Manmohan Singh and Sachin Pilot, who is half his age, speaks volumes about the leadership crisis within the Congress. Rahul may remain the most acceptable face of the Congress, but even he doesn't have the faith of more than 70 per cent respondents.

Even among Opposition leaders, Rahul Gandhi, the tallest leader of the Congress, is at No. 3, with just 13.3 per cent respondents supporting him as best suited to lead an Opposition alliance (a marginal improvement from August 2022 when 12.7 per cent respondents backed him). AAP chief and Delhi chief minister Arvind Kejriwal continues as the top choice for the second consecutive time, pipping Trinamool Congress chief and his West Bengal counterpart Mamata Banerjee to the second position. But the euphoria over Kejriwal, immediately after AAP's sweeping victory in Punjab, seems to have dwindled following its disappointing performance in the Gujarat assembly election in December last year, as the percentage of respondents backing
