DESTINATION INDIA AT DAG, DELHI, SHOWS HOW PERCEPTIONS AND TREATMENTS EVOLVED AMONG FOREIGN ARTISTS IN THE PRE-INDEPENDENCE ERA

For centuries, international artists, photographers and filmmakers visiting India have been captivated by the Taj Mahal. They have all captured the beauty and splendour of this monument with their own methods. For Charles William Bartlett (1860-1940), this method was ukiyo-e, the Japanese art of woodblock print-making and painting. Having travelled to Japan and collaborated with woodblock publisher Shozaburo Watanabe, Bartlett then travelled to India and applied these methods to the sights and monuments of India,

Like Father, (Un)like Daughter

An exhibition at Mumbai's Chatterjee & Lal compares and contrasts the works of an influential father-daughter artist duo

Any discussion of 20th-century Bombay art history is usually dominated by the illustrious Progressive Artists' Group, which makes the ongoing exhibition at Chatterjee & Lal a welcome departure. Resemblance: The Art of Rustom Siodia and Cumi Dallas is a joint showcase of the father-daughter duo who left a lasting impression on Indian art. The 40-odd artworks encompass landscapes, portraits and history paintings in mediums like watercolours, oil on canvas and graphite and ink on paper.

Born in 1881, Siodia was a painter, illustrator and essayist. The first Parsi (and the second Indian) ever to study at the Royal Academy, London (1908-1913), he was a student of John Singer Sargent and his early paintings—particularly the vivid landscapes—show influences of the famed American painter's style. The high point of Siodia's career came in 1929, when he (amongst other Sir J.J. School of Art artists) was commissioned to paint murals for the newly built Viceregal Lodge (later Rashtrapati Bhavan) in Delhi. His daughter Cumi was born in 1907 and graduated from Sir J.J. School of Art in painting and
