ment (FDI) in India. India making visa requirements for Canadian citizens stricter or banning travel by Canadian supporters of Khalistan is on the table too. An Indian diplomat says that the current row between the two nations is the outcome of a "lone initiative" by Trudeau for political gain. "Our approach to Canada will be reciprocal. If they go for economic sanctions etc., we will have to retaliate," he says.

Losing the West

Canada's allegations could complicate India's relations with key western allies. While countries like the US and UK have not openly sided with Canada, the spat raises concerns about how India is perceived internationally, particularly in terms of human rights and its growing role as a reliable contributor to global security. Security experts believe that Canada and the US—both part of the Five Eyes intelligence alliance—have coordinated their probes in the Nijjar case and that of the foiled plot to assassinate another
