HIGH ON PARTNERSHIP

IIM-Calcutta is training students to not just become business honchos, but also apply their skills to transform governance through collaborations

In August, Indian Institute of Management (IIM)–Calcutta signed an MoU with the government of Tripura to help it design a pharma logistics hub and school development policies, amongst other things. The deal is the latest in a series of partnerships that the ace B-school has forged in the recent past. In 2023, it had organised a five-day management trainee programme in collaboration with the government of West Bengal for newly elected panchayat members. The collaborations are testament to the institute's continuous endeavour towards bolstering its future.

IIM-C students are also a key part of this journey. The institute runs two full-time residential courses—Business Leadership in Manufacturing and Business Analytics—in association with other educational institutes and government bodies to create leaders of the future. For the former, it has partnered with the IITs in Kharagpur and Madras, the Confederation of Indian Industry and the government of Japan. The business analytics course is run along with the Indian Statistical Institute in Kolkata and IIT Kharagpur.

"In addition to this, we have trained over 1,500 head teachers of government and aided schools in West Bengal in 2023-24. The total pool of teachers would be around 2,000," says Professor Sumanta Basu, dean-Development and External Relations. He explains that IIM-C has also planned something called 'Hubs of Learning', where an ecosystem of best practices in co-located government schools will be planned, so that they can share the best practices of each other. "For instance, if the teacher of a certain subject is good in one school, we can arrange for students from other schools located nearby to get lessons from him from time to time," Basu says, adding that a proposal has been submitted to the West Bengal education department.
