A resilient woman achiever, Upasana Arora, the CEO and Managing Director of Yashoda Super Speciality Hospital has overcome significant challenges to make a mark in the healthcare sector. Her journey, shaped by early personal losses, led her to become a pivotal figure in the Yashoda Super Speciality Hospital. In this insightful interview, she shares her compelling story, from the initial uncertainties of her career path to her impactful initiatives in healthcare.

How did you come to be involved in this field? Your early life presented significant challenges; could you please share that part of your journey with us?

I would like to share my childhood story. I lost my father at the age of 10, and before my marriage, I also lost my mother, and the depth of my heartbreak was immeasurable, leaving me to navigate life's challenges with a heaviness that words can hardly do justice to. Despite harboring a desire to contribute to the healthcare sector, I initially found myself uncertain of the path to pursue. During this period, I was preparing for the IAS exam; however, unforeseen circumstances, including the loss of my mother and other personal challenges, prevented my appearance in the exam. Subsequently, I became affiliated with the Yashoda Hospital family, marking the initiation of my professional journey in 2000.

Upon joining our hospital, which was then a 100-bed facility lacking essential amenities like a cardiac lab and blood bank, I recognized the critical importance of timely interventions. Consequently, I strongly advocated within my family to establish these crucial facilities, considering the pivotal role cardiac angiography or angioplasty procedures play in saving lives within the crucial window.

My journey began with a profound understanding of the challenges faced by many, propelling me towards a commitment to enhance healthcare accessibility and inclusivity for those in need.
