

KEY TAKEAWAYS

- In the coming decades, the G3—China, the US and India—will shape the global order
- India-China relations are going to get worse before they get better, with the next five years being really turbulent, feels Saran

ADMIRATION AND PINPRICKS

How can India's position at the global high table improve or be challenged in the near future, now that it is well on its way to becoming an economic powerhouse? Samir Saran, president, Observer Research Foundation, said that India's growth will be celebrated, but would be accompanied by increasing demands for conformity, as well as "pushback and pinpricks". With a growing economy, we have to deal with another challenge—removing trade obstacles, supply chain irritants and ramp up manufacturing. President of the World Economic Forum Børge Brende said that with India's economy expected to grow from $3 trillion to $10 trillion in the coming decade, the country will have greater global influence and can invest more in education, healthcare and defence. For him, the challenges lie in neighbouring nations, where India and its adversary China vie for influence. Carnegie India director Rudra Chaudhuri said that a nation growing in influence will face challenges even with like-minded states. Recent challenges, especially the Ukraine war, have pushed India to diversify strategic resources and look to nations like the US and France for support. Another challenge, according to Chaudhuri, is India's future ability to quickly absorb the needs that arise out of "dislocation of economic production from one major country to others". Saran feels the next five years would be turbulent for India-China ties. "But when we have a $300 billion to $400 billion defence budget, we will make it costly for them to be adventurous," he said. ■

There are challenges for India, but if you grow economically, politically and strategically, there will be various challenges even with like-minded states

1. RUDRA CHAUDHURI
Director, Carnegie India, and Senior Lecturer, King's College London

WE HAVE A GOOD DECADE AHEAD OF GROWTH AND PROSPERITY, OF LIFTING PEOPLE OUT OF POVERTY AND MEETING THE ASPIRATIONS OF ONE AND A HALF BILLION PEOPLE. BUT WE HAVE TO BUILD OUR OWN MUSCLE TO RESPOND TO PUSHBACKS

2. SAMIR SARAN
President, ORF

With 50-60 per cent of global growth expected to come from emerging economies by 2040, India would do well to build an ecosystem of friends among the economies in Latin America, Africa and Asia

3. BØRGE BRENDE
President, World Economic Forum