↘ Despite security at every level, the suspect freely walks in and out of the hospital at 4 am

↘ Not only was he familiar with the lay of the hospital, he also knows the whereabouts of the victim

How did Sanjay Roy, the main accused in the case, get such unfettered access to the hospital premises? Equally confounding is the fact that he was familiar with the movements of doctors and his victim's whereabouts. He was, after all, a mere civic police volunteer, a force that West Bengal had constituted in 2012 to assist during festivals, elections and disaster management. Inducted in 2019, Roy lived in the barracks meant for the fourth battalion of the Kolkata armed police, something he was not entitled to. He would visit the hospital frequently, ostensibly to admit patients on behalf of the Kolkata Police Welfare Association. How he could have done this is another mystery since one needs to be a permanent member of the force to be inducted into the association.

The elevator to the third floor opens into a corridor where CCTV is installed. On examining its footage, Roy was found to have entered the seminar hall at around 3.45 am, come out around 4.35 am and left the hospital premises at 4.37 am. He was seen wearing earphones as he entered but they were not there when he came out. Pieces of a broken earphone were reportedly found in the seminar room. There is a door leading to the staircase at the rear end of the hall, but it did not have any CCTV. Other CCTVs do not record Roy's entry or exit.

What is not known is if he was in any way related to other activities of the hospital administration. When asked about his identity, all Kolkata police commissioner Vineet Goyal supplied was that he was a "criminal of the highest order".
