ferent functions in one project. The one in Gurgaon is five floors of retail and with an office tower. The Noida one is five floors of retail with a hotel tower and an office tower," shares Dalal.

The practice at any given point of time is working on several projects across the globe. "Sohrab essentially looks at all the large scale projects, while I look at only the boutique projects and all the interiors. So, we have a very clear division," says Bhagwati, whose team sits out of their Gurgaon office with a smaller team in the Delhi office. "My team is mainly in Delhi, and one team is in Gurgaon," explains Dalal.

Dalal's team is also busy working two on an office campus next to the Trident Hotel on the highway. "It's a collection of five office buildings," says Dalal. However, the most interesting project for Dalal is in Patiala for Thapar University that is aiming at making space for 15,000 students as opposed to their current 5,000. "For the first time we realised that we were actually creating spaces for people. We didn't have to bother about FSI and ground coverage and making sure that every square foot that we are able to get is being used."

Another interesting project is the Nagaland house in Delhi with 100 rooms, contemporary cues from vernacular architecture of Nagaland and bringing to the fore crafts from the region. "While my team is doing the architecture, the interiors, Sonali's team will work on," says Dalal. Both the verticals borrow a lot from one another. "For instance at the Nagaland House, we've done the whole concept, but on certain things where an interior perspective was needed, before finalising, we ran it through Sonali," he says.

Bhagwati proudly shares that she enjoys working on residences, "I find them very interesting because every home is completely different from the other. Dealing with each client is completely different from another, as well," she says. She is doing a lot of work for developers, show homes, clubs, and galleries.

As for this year, the duo has a lot planned. Not only have they opened up an office in Dubai, they are working on multiple projects in Africa and West Asia. Keep watching this space for more.
