COLOUR DRENCHING

All you need to know about this powerful technique to create an illusion of space in compact rooms

In the world of interior design, there's a new trend making waves. It's called colour drenching and it's a lot like how it sounds. Simply put it's drenching your space with a single colour. However, the impact is not as simple. Colour drenching has the remarkable ability to reduce visual noise and create the illusion of space.

See it to believe it

Seeing it on Pinterest and the gram one was fairly convinced that it will work given the workings of monochromes. But when doing my own room it was a different ball game. The results (see image of the left, of my study), had me truly believing this trend.

It shakes things up

This bold approach is all about immersing your space in a single, confident colour from top to bottom, creating a strikingly cohesive look that's anything but boring. It's a departure from the traditional design rulebook, and tosses aside the idea of a balanced colour scheme in favour of a daring statement. I for one am convinced that ceilings are tired of being white.

Who is it for?

If you love instant drama and want depth, colour drenching is for you. Whether you live in a sleek modern apartment or a cosy vintage-inspired space—it'll work. It's the perfect way to breathe life into a dull, uninspired room, infusing it with personality and pizzazz.
